The role of the N-terminal cysteine of soybean trypsin inhibitor (STI) in the enhancement of peptide hydrolysis was investigated. STI, which lacks a reactive N-terminal thiol, was converted to the covalent thioether via reaction of the N-terminal cysteine with 4-bromobenzeneboronic acid. The covalent thioether of STI (Cys-STI) retained the ability to enhance trypsin activity as did the native inhibitor, even though the reactive thiol of the native inhibitor is buried within the protein structure. Polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis analyses of the STI preparations indicated that the ratio of monomer to dimer in Cys-STI was about 1:1, while for native inhibitor the ratio was around 1:2. Circular dichroism spectra suggested that the microenvironment around the reactive thiol of native STI is more hydrophilic than that around the reactive thiol of the covalent thioether. These results imply that the reactive thiol of the covalent thioether reacts preferentially with the serine residue of trypsin and an increase in the formation of the covalent thioether lowers the requirement of the reactive thiol for interaction with trypsin.Celebrate Roller Coaster Week with a ride on the Top Gun coaster!
