1. Storm of Death The ground beneath the castle is a scene of devastation. From the library window, Bishop Xilas looks down in horror at the heaped corpses that litter the burnt grassland. The battle with the other side had barely rumbled over half an hour ago, and before dusk fell, the numbers had become clear: the Sacred Forest had been defeated. Countless dead branches were strewn across the ground as the onslaught of trees had roared forth from the Court of Warriors, their limbs torn apart by the warlord's own baleful tree magic. At his will, the stone manacles around the necks of the stunned creatures had thickened into a living prison of granite, imprisoning them in spite of their frantic struggles. Such prisoners then deteriorated into foetal strands suspended in the earth by the dry, foul-smelling thorns that grew everywhere about the citadel. Seared corpses strewn across the field littered the area around the wall; and the barracks were also cordoned off, the palace guard's gleaming armour broken and looted. "The trees are only a small part," Xilas said softly to his manservant, Ysabeth. At the master's voice, the manservant shot a venomous look at the bishop. "The dead still walk, my lord." The other man knew full well that the master was speaking of the nymphs still consumed by the continual taint from the tangled tapestry of dead branches. "I long to defile that one," Xilas sighed. "It will take decades, but I will make you pay for our long past. That is a punishment your peers shall never know." The manservant's next words was distinctly unamused, though Xilas did not care. "I am going downstairs to see if the docks were anything but a complete disaster. The slightest storm could have sunk any number of ships in the harbour, and I pray we have enough to sail as many ships out of such a shambles. At the first gleam of a dragon, we should have a full company of soldiers in the air, ready to swoop over the city and take it out from the sky, in the event that the humans -" Ysabeth's expression was one of total disgust. "- hold any other hissable sentiments towards the fallen kingdom." A few moments later, the tiefling's form disappeared from the window, the wooden portal
