I noticed some people are just saying "kinda", a lot, and I feel like they're probably just saying that as a substitute for "a bit" and "a little", but I'm not really sure. Is this a thing? Do people have a more complex reason for using that than "a bit"? A: First, some grammar. "Do you want to go to the movies?" "Ain't gonna watch a movie but kinda, yeah." "I'll come to your house later." "Why?" "Kinda?" The thing is that "a bit" and "a little" often expresses something of a level of certainty about something, so something that is only sorta or maybe is usually (or always?) insufficiently certain for something like that to be considered "certain." This is not at all implied in the usage of "kinda" and "kinda some", which is why "kinda" and "kinda some" might not be useful, depending on the context. To judge by some of these questions on English Language and Usage, there is a negative connotation to the word "kinda" that is not present in "a bit" or "a little" or "barely". When people say "kinda" they are generally talking about something or someone that isn't of an "X" level of certainty, but that something is still "kinda" closer to "X" than "not X." A: I'm not really sure for sure, but I feel like it's related to "a bit". And sometimes "a little
