The gender biases that affect our choices of what kind of job we want to have and how we want to spend our time are the same biases that affect what kind of care people receive in hospitals or how they raise their children, a Dartmouth College study finds. And, because there are distinct hierarchies in these gender-stereotypic corporate roles, men are more likely to climb the ladder, and women to end up on the bottom rungs, the researchers say. "When women are advancing up the ladder, they are still taking on the traditional feminine role," said Diana Fisman, author of "The Next Level: On Women's Strategies for Success in the New Economy" and associate research scientist at the Tuck School of Business. "And they are still expected to be warm and nurturing. It's not a strategic win for them."

advertisement Specifically, the researchers examined the nature of how females and males spend their time in ten jobs with different levels of authority. They examined time-use data from over 5,000 Americans, to see how much time people spent doing their work, whether they had formal rules specifying when they had to be available (often called "non-billable" hours), and which tasks they were doing well and not so well. The most traditional job ("man's job"), which encompassed jobs like manager, CFO, doctor and lawyer, showed men spent significantly more time with non-billable hours than women. In part, that's because men performed more non-billable jobs. But it was only men, rather than women, who seemed to have the freedom to make their own preferences known to colleagues without fear of repercussions. In all of these jobs, women were less likely than men to make calls or meet with customers directly. In contrast, women often spend the most time with non-billable hours in supporting jobs, including secretary, nurse and manager of nursing homes or hospital. The trouble for women, says Fisman, is that their level of involvement in non-billable jobs is closely tied to the favorability of their male supervisor. advertisement In the second-highest non-billable job, nurse, women working for
