The Dungeon Alphabet is a reference tool for classic fantasy dungeon design featuring advice, hints and random tables for both fiction and role-playing games. Challenge your friends by climbing the Dungeon Alphabet and find out who's the better DM! Features: An A-to-Z Reference for Classic Dungeon Design Suitable for any rules system About The Author Michael Curtis is a Dungeon Master who plays on a Pathfinder-based game. Working for British Telecom in the UK as a software engineer, he has spent the past twenty years coding, generating code, and creating test environments and infrastructures for multiple platforms. While his primary love is gaming, he's also interested in reading and has managed to publish a few short stories. In his spare time he's also enjoyed playing and creating Dungeons and Dragons campaigns. In his free time, he plays Dungeons and Dragons, role-plays, designs and codes dungeons and runs campaigns for players of all levels. Michael finds them most entertaining when they're played with equal skill. He runs his own campaign series called The Baron's Curse: The Colossal, and has also written and self-published a self-contained campaign called PopenTheSidewall for playing with RPLite. Regardless of the game system or ruleset, Michael has been a victim of the dungeon craze. As a few more and more releases turn up every day, he couldn't help but help but to compile a reference book of assorted tables and other information to aid game masters in their dungeon design needs. What's new in Konung 3: Ties Of The Dynasty:

Jousting is a past time. Past time. Making your way through the seas is something I consider to be my duty, and I suppose that having lived as a native of this land for so long, in local dens, the tenuous commute to and from the city, I enjoy the simple tale-tale of being set aloft. The city is a rich maze. Through the unwavering and the quick and the sharp and the glaring, there are always more paths, and more forms in the thrusting blades, the guarding guards, the steely-eyed lookout's, and the panicky roams out to look around, usually finding that there are still more paths, and worse blades, alarms and seeking guards, so that back at the gates one screams out to the pale and pastel veterans that wait with the moist wind and a calm parent's voice, that there are still more paths to be forged, guards to be drawn, blades to be drawn, and swarms to be beaded and frozen with arcs, and darts to thin the ranks of the storm and rattle the walls of the city. There is more. And there will always be more. And so while the paths to war and death aren't what I would choose, because they are often for profit, or for life, for honor and power, for cause and effect and ambition, there is that which is ideal. The gamesmanship of it all. The tides of the seas go to war. There are no casualties of any mark save those who wish to be, and those who have been. The ships patrol, the jaws clutch, the foamy waves roll by, the guard stands in the towers, their breasts aflame, an upright forest of metal, and the warriors pull at the rods, their chariots' wild he-she-isms and their uncountable arches, and joust, and thrust, and any one who can find a slant, will have done well. Hearing reports has been the constant companion, and so my time at the city's courts set in this way. But there have been winds and there have been times when the hearts go quick and the winds do blow. She never comes, but she never goes. Sometimes, when the winds do blow and the words are so sweet and the faces are so bright and the heartbeats come quick and the memory of her is so sweet, I can only think
