After his death the emperor Frederick II also invaded the Papal States, and he "went to pay his respects to Gregory's tomb, and the city that Gregory had adorned and embellished with amazing splendour and comfort"; he visited the monastery in the city, and he was astonished by the beautiful church, telling the people, "God's work is done here, and it was by his own divine glory that you have built the most splendid church and convent in all the Italian realm." In the second half of the 15th century, the Como became under the influence of the Republic of Venice, and later was occupied by French troops.
