Although the legalization of marijuana has been debated for nearly a century, it seems that the biggest question most people have about legalized marijuana is “What does it smell like?” Marijuana contains certain scents that can be pleasant, or not so pleasant, to many people. Before drug laws were created, it was commonly believed that pot was akin to pine resin, and thus had a delicious scent. However, many today argue that this is not the case, and many substances are produced with the intent to make pot smell horrible. Beyond its odor, some people have claimed that marijuana “feels” like a harmless flower, or that it feels like a five year old was smoking it, causing “relaxing” or “euphoric” sensations. Others claim that it gives them claustrophobia. In reality, the effects of marijuana are usually a combination of these, depending on how it is being consumed, the individual, and how a particular person’s senses react to the experience. The concept of the smell of marijuana has a long history. In the 15th century, it was reported that in certain European counties, and in places where there was a high demand for it, a woman could smell cannabis during her menstrual cycle and thus determine e79caf774b
