Photoshop CS5 isn't the only Photoshop release to offer support for web developers. In fact, there are 7 other Photoshop versions for web and media developers. What's more, Photoshop Elements, the first Photoshop edition for the average consumer, was released almost 13 years ago, a welcome alternative for the busy, but amateur web developer. If you're looking to learn more about Photoshop, this is a great starting point. Plus, it's free.

High-quality tools for web developers Many web developers use Photoshop to edit and create images for websites. Some of the most popular tools for web developers include Photoshop, ImageMagick, GIMP, Fireworks, Illustrator, InDesign, Omnigraffle and Sketch. However, these web-centric tools only provide a limited set of functions compared to Photoshop. And they don't offer all of Photoshop's features, like multi-image editing, raster and vector editing, batch operations, and filters. However, Photoshop is not only designed for web developers. It can also help you improve photographs, design posters and book covers, create vector graphics, produce animated GIFs, and more.

Image sizes Designing images is a lot easier when you have a basic understanding of image sizes. Image sizes in Photoshop The least common denominator for image sizes is 72 pixels, but the least common denominator for most websites is 24 pixels. When you're designing images for a website, you have to keep in mind the fact that you'll be resizing your images on a pixel-by-pixel basis. Therefore, if you select a 1250px by 2000px image, you'll end up with a 2000px by 2000px image. The more you resize an image, the larger it becomes, and the larger it becomes, the more pixels you'll need to add to your design. As a general rule of thumb, you should aim for as little as possible. One of the most common ways to reduce the size of an image is to add a rectangular marquee selection around it. When you're selecting a marquee around an image, the selection will automatically be resized to fit the selected marquee. There's nothing like a good old-fashioned smaller-than-required method of reducing the size of an image. What you need to understand 388ed7b0c7

A woman shows her ink on her hand as she buys dried squid at a market in the northeastern Japanese city of Sendai February 3, 2013. (Reuters/Toru Hanai) Japan unveiled plans on Thursday to spend 20 trillion yen ($206 billion) on a triple-pronged drive to revive the economy that could involve rewriting the country's constitution. The incoming Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) says it will invest in industries including healthcare, next-generation transport systems and life sciences to wean Japan off exports that are no longer in demand. The world's third-largest economy recorded its first full-year of economic contraction in five years in the third quarter. "We are going to establish a new industrial policy based on the concept of 'smart cluster', which combines the three pillars of the economy," new economy minister Yasuhiro Nakasone told reporters. "We will use science and technology to create a more varied, prosperous society." The latest policy promises are part of a revival plan that the government said would involve "shaking up" the domestic economy by spending on infrastructure, improving pension and health care systems, and education. The government had aimed to revise the constitution to make it easier to make government policy on cutting the pensions deficit and spending. About 80 percent of the fiscal changes proposed will be implemented in 2017 and 2018, with full implementation starting in 2020. The policy would also involve the creation of 700,000 square metres of government-owned land to house the bio-to-healthcare industrial corridor, as well as affordable-housing projects in Tokyo and other cities. Nakasone said 100,000 apartments would be completed in Tokyo by 2020, and construction would begin on the university district of Tsukuba, the country's first "smart" city. The policy includes plans to build a new government office complex which would help government agencies reform their operations and cut overtime, and will also see the introduction of a child care subsidy program for the first time in 35 years, he added. By the end of 2013, 30,000 housing units would be available for rent, while the government would also spend 55.5 billion yen on building roads and railways. In line with Abe's program to move Japan's aging population into productive jobs, he said the government would spend 200 billion
