New Drivers Â· Microsoft Applied Sciences.Tunisia has mounted a tough stance against the so-called "Islamic State" (IS) terrorist group, considering itself a frontline state in the fight to "eradicate" the militants and their ideology. One of the manifestations of this state of mind is that the Tunisian authorities have moved quickly to reverse a proposed law that would pave the way to criminalizing, in case of flagrant offenses, the promotion of IS's ideology. The symbolic nature of this law has already been expressed through the use of the facsimile "flag of the Islamic State" by the Tunisian authorities, in an attempt to present their unwavering stance against the group. This law, approved by the parliament in July 2015, is expected to be implemented in the near future. However, in what is seen as a direct response to the recent events in Tunisia, the Parliament's upper house, the Senate, rejected the law recently by a narrow margin. The bill, originally designed to punish the use of "IS logos or slogans within the framework of public events held by the group e79caf774b
