Hotels Hotels are generally classified by 2 main types: chain or independent. A hotel chain is a collection of individual hotels (and their respective star and government licenses) often owned by a single organization. The chain group operates under a unified brand, marketing, and, in some cases, management. Chain hotels provide a standard and consistent level of service and facilities for each guest, either by design or by limiting the number and type of hotels for which each new property is built. The chain hotel can be contrasted with the independent hotel, which is a privately-owned hotel or other lodging establishment that is not owned by a chain. Independent hotels usually provide a more personalized level of service and are often less expensive than chain hotels. They may also charge higher fees for use of certain amenities, such as mini-fridges, because they provide personalized services, which the chains do not provide. Hotel chains are also considered luxury brands, and may feature a number of luxury trademarks, including luxury hotel chains. The 2019 Forbes billionaires list included six hotel chains. A hotel also forms the core of a tourism industry. Hotels are also used in military functions to accommodate soldiers, officers, and their families. A hotel may be used for meetings, conferences, conventions, weddings, or entertainment, as a venue or even as a celebrity's home away from home. History The first hotel was established in Europe during the 13th century by a knight on his crusade. He d0c515b9f4
