The paper tries to describe the origins and development of women's studies from the 1970s and 80s, highlighting the emergence of gender as the dominant concept. It claims that, in feminist thinking, the concept of gender brings together the particular interests of women and their oppression in the material world. It argues that the concept of gender should be used as a wider schema to cover a plurality of factors that create the concept of 'work': the discrimination and exploitation of women in relation to work, the hegemonic ideology through which men exercise power, the internalization of male values, and the constitution of women's bodies through the medicalization of reproduction. The paper illustrates these claims by analysing six articles written by a British sociologist during the 1970s and 80s. The study ends by outlining the interests behind the emergence of gender as a concept, and raises ethical questions concerning the present and future of feminist thinking.Q: Filter on related object I have a main object that contains a list of objects of type Image.
