Differing roles of let-7b and miR-19b in colorectal cancer. microRNAs (miRNAs) are a class of short non-coding RNA that regulate protein-coding genes mainly through binding to the 3' untranslated region. miRNAs are abundantly found in colorectal cancer (CRC) and play important roles in CRC progression and metastasis. The let-7 family of miRNAs is upregulated in CRC and acts as a tumor-suppressor, but the action of the miR-19b family is not clear. In this study, we found miR-19b was upregulated in CRC cells, compared to the normal colonic epithelial cells (HCECs). Also, ectopic expression of miR-19b promoted CRC cell proliferation and migration. In contrast, knockdown of endogenous miR-19b inhibited growth and motility of CRC cells. Moreover, when we ectopically expressed miR-19b with low expression of let-7b in CRC cell lines, we observed that let-7b had a tumor-suppressive role in CRC cells. Our results clearly suggested that miR-19b promotes CRC cell migration and proliferation, whereas, let-7b exerts its tumor-suppressive role via enhancing their suppression of cell migration and proliferation. We also found that miR-19b-mRNA interactions are elevated in CRC cells. The expression of the downstream genes of miR-19b, CHD3, caspase-7, and Smad2 were correlated with miR-19b levels, and their high expression was associated with poor prognosis in CRC patients. These findings suggest that miR-19b promotes CRC progression, and its high expression is related to poor survival. `if(offset > 0) { z->c = z->l - m_keep; [int ret = slice_from_(z, 3, s_34); /*`
