We report on an innovative approach for the fabrication of a high-performance asymmetric zeolite membrane. The proposed methodology combines the use of inverse micellar growth and post-synthesis treatment to give rise to an ion transport membrane with exceptionally high performance. Micellar templating was used as an effective tool to create a composite membrane where interpenetrating anionic and cationic pores were arranged in an alternating way. This strategy allowed the formation of a significantly enhanced pore structure, both in terms of the active ion transport and in terms of the stability over a broad range of operating conditions. The membrane's performance was evaluated in three distinct tests (water permeability, chloride separation, and water recovery). The results show that the overall performance of the membrane was significantly increased compared to commercial membranes and that it is an ideal candidate for the efficient separation of water-borne ions.Q: Python: Manipulating table delimited text file by color, line, character, row, column I have a tab delimited text file with −1 million rows. The data is all integers from 0-15 on one row and 3 columns. The file can be downloaded in pdf form here. There are two distinct sets of 0-15 values, however the file contains random noise data that I have no interest in. Ideally I want to scan each row, check to see if it contains any black or white pixels in a 5x5 square, if so, grab all the non-zero values within that bounding box and save them as a new tab delimited text file. This new file will be smaller than the original but otherwise be identical. Having trouble navigating the file itself and having trouble with scipy.ndimage.correlate to create my code. A: Unfortunately, I'm not a numpy ninja, but after a few hours of reading some python function documentation I came up with this function that iterates through the numpy array, converts it to a list of lists and then checks to see which sub-lists are non-zero, making a bounding box around them and then appending them to a list. def rotate_array(array): 1cdb36666d
