Digital geologic models are often constructed from "snapshots" of the subsurface taken by a geophysical survey or, in some cases, field mapping of wells, boreholes, or other features in the subsurface. The model typically represents the subsurface as having two layers of the lithologic materials. The interior layer is sometimes referred to as "lower", "lower bound", or "mantle" and the exterior is sometimes referred to as "upper", "upper bound" or "crust." In actuality, the lithologies are not discrete layers, but are part of a continuous, three-dimensional geologic structure. A conventional geologic model, such as that shown in FIG. 1, contains an interior layer 100 of the subsurface and an exterior layer 110 of the subsurface. The interior layer 100 is constructed from overlapping sections of the subsurface that are thought to have formed relatively recently, called "snapshots" 101, 102, 103, and 104 that are typically located on or near the surface. The exterior layer 110 contains sections that represent a region of the subsurface that is assumed to be older than the interior layer, called a "subsurface." The different layers and, in some cases, sections may be combined or coordinated into one or more 3D digital geologic models. A number of techniques have been used to construct subsurface models of this type, including the use of wells, drilling, and seismic or resistivity surveys. Examples of such techniques are described in the following publications, the disclosures of

For me it has to be a good tool for drawing in a free time. But I dont want to sell anything just rent it.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a liquid crystal display device used in a display section of an electronic instrument such as a mobile phone, a car navigation device or a personal computer. More particularly, the invention relates to a liquid crystal display device including a liquid crystal display section having a double-cell structure, in which a first cell and a second cell each having electrode substrate with a plurality of common electrodes arranged thereon and a plurality of pixel electrodes arranged thereon is set to a state of a half-tone phase and the first cell and the second cell are formed with a phase difference. 2. Related Background Art In recent years, a liquid crystal display device having a double-cell structure in which two liquid crystal cells are disposed side by side (hereinafter, referred to as a double-cell type liquid crystal display device) is mainly used in a display section of a mobile phone and a car navigation device because it is superior in space efficiency and luminance. In the case of the double-cell type liquid crystal display device, two substrates constituting the liquid crystal cell are provided in a back light (external light source) side by side in a state of, for example, opposed to each other, and a liquid crystal molecule is sandwiched and held between these two substrates. In a substrate having formed thereon a plurality of pixel electrodes, pixel-electrode-forming wiring lines (gate bus lines), scanning signal-inputting gate bus lines and the like are formed, whereas in a substrate having formed thereon a plurality of common electrodes (counter electrodes), common-electrode-forming wiring lines, driving signal-inputting common electrodes, and the like are formed. The pixel-electrode-forming wiring
