Two different series of models of tyrosine are examined to determine the origin of intramolecular bond strengths that contribute to the oxygen-to-tyrosine spin-spin coupling. The first series consists of the simple model compounds, HX-OH (X = Cl, Br, I), and the second consists of a series of chromophores with pKa values of -X-4, where X = Cl, Br, and I, and the chromophores contain two phenolic hydroxyl and an electron withdrawing radical. The intramolecular bond strengths can be examined with the two series by examining the relation between the observed oxygen-to-tyrosine spin-spin coupling constant (J) and pKa for the phenolic hydroxyl. This analysis is based on the assumption that the mechanism for the spin-spin coupling involves exchange of hyperfine-split, closely spaced, high-spin-state tyrosyl radicals in the ground electronic state via a Franck-Condon transition. Under the experimental conditions used to record the coupling constants, it is found that the oxygen-to-tyrosine spin-spin coupling, J, of the two halogenated tyrosines is linearly related to the pKa of the phenolic hydroxyl. This indicates that the hydrogen-bond interaction between the phenolic oxygen and the tyrosyl radical in the B-state is a major contributor to the spin-spin coupling. A similar linear dependence is observed for the pKa for both the phenolic hydroxyl and tyrosyl radical. The linear relation between the pKa of the phenolic hydroxyl and spin-spin coupling constant, J, is evidence of a second resonance interaction, in addition to the resonance interaction due to the phenolic hydrogen.Exploring the factors influencing physician-assisted suicide decision-making using two different decision-
