Adobe Photoshop 8.0 Download - Best Software. So when a content-creation organization like Flatiron Monster starts worrying about what all that content means for its advertisers, it's easy to see how a lot of people can get a little freaked. Case in point: a new blog post on Flatiron Monster's site, which points to a new study "analyzing the correlation between gender-focused content and advertising revenue." Flatiron Monster lists the "research," done by the web analytics company comScore, as part of an "ongoing experiment" to "see what happens when we roll out more gender-focused content." Basically, this means an increase in posts with a "female audience" theme, such as fashion, cooking or sport. The idea is to get more participation from women, who comprise about half of all social media users but make up only 34% of the audience for Facebook, comScore found. Flatiron Monster itself notes that its audience is mostly men, but the publisher — which boasts a “social and video strategy” — is aiming for a “balanced audience.” The latest content “experiment” was supposed to go live on Friday, but on Thursday, Flatiron Monster’s CEO Mike Kappel said the company postponed the launch “because we didn’t want this to be misinterpreted.” His reasoning? Flatiron Monster simply wanted to be “open and honest” with its readers. “I read the title and it really kind of startled me,” Kappel told Adweek. “It certainly didn’t look like a reflection of our company or what we do. And that’s why I said, ‘No.’” [Update: Adweek got the impression from its own readers that Flatiron Monster’s blog post might have been satirical — but comScore’s findings apparently aren’t. Kappel says he sent the analytics company a note to clarify that the post was factual, but he also says there’s probably not much the company can
