M1 and M2 macrophages: origins, heterogeneity, and roles in metabolism. Macrophages are the key innate immune cells that are involved in various immunoregulatory processes, from feeding to inflammation. Macrophages have been traditionally classified as either M1 or M2. M1 macrophages, which are classically activated by interferon-gamma/LPS, are alternatively activated by interleukin 4/IL-4. M2 macrophages, on the other hand, are alternatively activated by transforming growth factor-beta/IL-13. Although many of the molecular and cellular mechanisms underlying M1 and M2 macrophage differentiation have been elucidated, there is still a paucity of knowledge regarding the developmental and evolutionary origins of M1 and M2 macrophages, and regarding the mechanism(s) through which these two distinct macrophage types affect whole-body metabolism. 6d1f23a050
