Patients with chronic inflammatory demyelinating polyneuropathy (CIDP) have features suggestive of neuropathy-based impairment of cerebral function, which may influence cognitive and mental function. We determined the magnitude and pattern of cerebral dysfunction in CIDP, as revealed by quantitative electroencephalography (EEG) and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). Seventeen patients with CIDP were compared with 15 normal subjects. Quantitative EEG (qEEG) and fast low-angle shot MRI were performed in all subjects. Patients with CIDP did not differ from normal subjects in terms of demographics, but had lower performance in the Symbol Digit Modalities Test and Trail Making Test-Part B. Lower frequency power and longer alpha and theta dipole distance were significantly found in the CIDP group, but not in the normal subjects. In the CIDP group, the occipital lobe was preferentially involved, whereas the brain stem was predominantly affected in normal subjects. The abnormalities of qEEG and MRI were correlated with clinical features. The findings suggest that CIDP is associated with cerebral dysfunction, especially in the brain stem and occipital lobe. This difference could be due to the fact that the data in the study by Hove et al. were based on normal tissue whereas the present study included all types of non-cancerous tissue. An important issue in our study was whether miR-99b and miR-320a are predictive of CRT response. In univariate analysis, we found that high levels of miR-99b and low levels of miR-320a were associated with a poor response. However, no significant association was found between miR-99b or miR-320a and CRT response in multivariate analysis. There were two possible explanations for the difference between the univariate and multivariate analysis.
