

The `setValue()` method must set the contents of the text field to the specified value, changing the contents of the input field to a string of that value, if the platform support setting the value of text fields. The `setSelection()` method must cause the contents of the text field to be fully selected, with the selection direction being none, if the platform support selections with the direction none, or otherwise forward. The user agent must then queue a task to fire a simple event that bubbles named `select` at the element, using the user interaction task source as the task source. The `selectInRange()` method must cause the contents of the text field to be fully selected, with the selection direction being none, if the platform support selections with the direction none, or otherwise forward. The user agent must then queue a task to fire a simple event that bubbles named `select` at the element, using the user interaction task source as the task source. This method must be called only once per element. The selection cannot also be caused by some method that is invoked after the `selectInRange()` method has run. The `setSelectionRange()` method must cause the selection that is caused by the `setSelection()` method to be made relative to the value of the element and/or the value of its `contenteditable` attribute, as follows: The element must have the `range-changing` attribute value of `none`; if the element's `range-changing` attribute is not the default of `none`, the element must have the `range-changing` attribute set to the value of `forward` or to the value of `rtl`; if the element's `contenteditable` attribute is not the default of `false`, then the selection must be relative to the element's content; otherwise, the selection must be relative to the element's content, with the selection direction being forward and the selection extending to the beginning of the first line and to the end of the last line. 5ec8ef588b
