"The conviction of these activists for their peaceful peaceful activities is yet another sign of the authorities' increasing crackdown on civil society and their increasingly draconian policies against freedom of expression," said Malcolm Smart, Amnesty International's Middle East and North Africa director. The two were arrested in 2015 while working with the Center for Arabic Language and Culture in Jeddah. They were both sentenced to 10 years in jail and hard labor, 10 years for publishing content containing seditious content and five years for inciting "disbelief" in Islam. In May, another blogger was sentenced to 10 years in prison for "subverting" the state and spreading religious extremism. At least 12 other people have been arrested in the past three months for allegedly spreading extremism, according to Human Rights Watch. The Saudi authorities have also imprisoned clerics and religious scholars for talking about Islam in new ways. Saudi Arabia says its judiciary is independent, but critics say judges have no power to question the legislation underpinning their cases, which opponents say limits freedom of speech and worship. In September, the kingdom passed a "anti-cybercrime" law that makes online criticism a crime punishable by up to 10 years in prison. Identification of calcium-binding proteins in the brain and their distribution in the nervous system. Binding of Ca2+ by Ca2+-binding proteins could be of significance in physiological and pathological processes in the brain. In the present study, we have identified a large number of Ca2+-binding proteins in the brain using affinity chromatography with immobilized EGTA. The proteins were obtained by acid extraction, and the acidic extraction procedure was also employed for some tissue preparations. In both the whole brain and cerebral cortex, the amounts of Ca2+-binding proteins are lower than in other tissues. The results show a high degree of concordance between the acid-extracted and EGTA-chromatography fractions, and the identification of Ca2+-binding proteins by affinity chromatography with EGTA as ligand is confirmed. In order to obtain a more specific and comprehensive mapping of the distribution of calcium-binding proteins in the nervous system, the subcellular localization of some of these proteins was studied. Membrane-bound Ca2+-binding proteins were found to be concentrated in the neuron perikaryon. The brain tissue preparation that was used for the subcellular distribution of Ca2+-binding proteins contained also a relatively high amount of Ca2+-binding proteins.
