this bigml cloud-based tool can be used to develop and run machine learning models for large-scale data sets. the organization is based in cambridge, uk, and its ceo is eugene efimenko. the service supports supervised and unsupervised classification, regression and clustering, binary classification, n-ary classification, feature selection, ranking and recommendation. at first glance, the activity system in the fall certainly looks good: it not only calculates farm completions, but includes inter-character interactions and non-combat activities as well. it replaces old autosave and leveling methods, and is designed for a new kind of rpg. however, the site offers very little information about the new system, and no screen shots. i was unable to find any code or documentation on the activity system online. when i asked the game developer on reddit, he confirmed that i was correct. this is perhaps most obvious in the new difficulty modes, which are only present in fall. the game includes several permutations of easy, normal and hard, with the easiest mode having the fewest enemies in a given area; it seems that your character's difficulty is a direct result of the encounter rates in your game. also, your success in the easy mode is an indicator of your skill in that mode, so in a sense, the difficulty modes are about what you're used to, not what you're good at. the game now also includes options for saving after each encounter, at the character level or the group level, rather than only after the entire party is dead. recent evidence suggests that star legends: the first heros being cancelled is due to the filing of a lawsuit by ubisoft over alleged piracy. the news also reveals that no financial decisions have been made, so there's a good chance that we'll still be playing star legends come the end of this month. however, the warthog news article quoted a ubisoft dev who said that they consider it to be an "embarassingly bad game". whether that's true or not, this article offers a list of suggestions for submitting a letter of support for star legends to ubisoft's investors, as the lawsuit could lead to the game's cancellation. however, the article also points out that yves guillemot, the company's ceo, is optimistic.
