Lightroom CC recently received another update, adding a brand new lens bundle. This update brought the title up to version 6.7.1, and now the app is even more powerful when it comes to matching your photos to a setting or conditions. Those conditions, along with the new manual lens settings, are invaluable when you're shooting for lifecasting, and the automatic features are a top priority for me. New in the latest Lightroom is the ability to use Exposure Blending technology to enhance a scene while using a wide range of inputs. This new capability is built on top of Lightroom's existing manual and automatic exposure matching features, and it allows for the most accurate possible result. "It is the natural work-flow approach to combine the strengths of Lightroom's automatic and manual tools," said Lightroom lead engineer Matt Brady. The new feature can be used to blend images or videos into a single, blended exposure, or to restore details from an out-of-focus subject (resulting in a new "blurred" level). It can also be used for creating creative visual effects, or to blend multiple images together. Lightroom CC provides three tools for using this new technology: a new Manual Exposure control that adjusts the blended image based on the input, HDR tone mapping that looks at the scene's highlights and shadows using the HDR mode and appropriate tone mapping algorithms, and new Blend Images preferences that manage how the process happens. Like all good editing software, Adobe Photoshop Elements also offers the ability to watermark your work. But the process now may be easier than ever to use. In the current version, you can easily insert module to watermark the images in a folder of photos, or even in an individual image. The fingerprint integration feature makes sure that your fingerprint information is kept for future reference, but you can just as easily erase it if you so choose. If you're worried about this creating problems in the future, you can draw a new fingerprint on a new layer. And if you're concerned that a fingerprint could cause issues when you share your photos online, you can always "erase" it.
