I had issues to dual boot with two monitors. I never thought it would be such a hassle. The first time I installed Lion it asked me to install the second monitor on the system. When I already had the second monitor running as a projector, it installed as a mirror. I made sure to turn off mirroring since I didn't want to use two monitors at the same time. So I had to turn it off the projector and switch my set up. I realized that I needed to make sure I boot my computer using the projector and not the second monitor. So I plugged the projector into my motherboard, but it would not install any driver. I tried to follow all the steps mentioned on support.adobe.com, but that did not work. There are 1.8 million different systems on the world and according to Adobe there should be enough hardware support for every one. I spent some in-depth research on the forums and every post I found was of people with similar issues. I nobody that could show me how to get things to work in the same set up I had before. No one could get it to work when I starting fresh with my computer with only one monitor. Now I realize this is nothing for big time companies and I don't want to piss off big time companies but I find it very hard to believe with the support Adobe gives me.

I tried the support ticket again just to be sure I got it properly. They looked at it and asked about my system permissions, tried and asked if it was connected properly. I sent them a screenshot that showed that it was properly connected.
