As Adobe began to look at the way web designers were working, they realized a number of problems were happening. For example:

- Sometimes advanced Photoshop features were being implemented in Web applications. But, the Web could not emulate those features exactly.
- There was no way to do an interactive Photoshop tutorial on the Web, where the user could follow along and try things for themselves, without the need for expensive plugins.
- This made the Web slower and more expensive than it should have been. Users were presented large page views that they had to save in order to learn new things.
- Even if downloaded, AS3 included too many libraries to download.
