Sex determination has been studied in various bilaterian animals, but in most species this involves the sex chromosomes. Although some opisthobranch molluscs have been shown to contain an active sex determination mechanism, in most of the molluscan phylum the gonadal differentiation process has not been studied in great detail. To provide such an analysis, we cloned the cDNA sequences of hox4b (GATA-4 homolog in humans) and hdac4 (histone deacetylase in humans) in the mud snail, Planorbis corneus. These two genes were highly expressed in the gonad and are likely to play important roles in gonadal development. This constitutes the first identification of a gene of potential importance in sex determination in any species of mollusc. In addition, genes that are highly expressed in the brain of P. corneus, such as the neuropeptide gene pet-1, as well as genes highly expressed in the gonads such as a chick homologue of a ubiquitin-conjugating enzyme E2, pcsd1, were also identified. The expression of these genes in the gonads and brain correlates with a gonadal or gonadal-type sexual dimorphism in the
