I know they both are used to apply the changes in existing branch. Are there any differences between them? For example, what one is better to avoid conflicts? A: Regarding cherry-pick: You may have conflicts, even if you intend them Using git cherry-pick for this purpose is quite dangerous. Imagine you have conflict in some file Your two revisions are merged together When you now run git cherry-pick The result is to merge some file, which will have a conflict by this merge. In other words: using git cherry-pick to cherry-pick a merge is not safe at all. Also cherry-pick works with any number of revisions, not just on top of the current one. The merge is always at the beginning, with any number of "upstream" revisions preceding this. Git merge On the other hand git merge is intended to be safe. It is meant to be used to merge two existing branches, like: git merge feature-123 If you have the tip of "feature-123" (even if this is a completely new tip, not yet in the target branch), then it doesn't matter if the merge of this branch is safe or not. Git cherry-pick is not meant to merge anything, as it takes any number of upstream revisions as well. So you will get a conflict with such a cherry-pick if the merge was safe. A: This answer is dependent on the OS you are using. On Windows,
