shareware.Biomarker-based molecular therapy for glioblastoma multiforme. Glioblastoma multiforme (GBM) is an aggressive glial tumour that is resistant to current treatments, remaining one of the most deadly central nervous system malignancies. Biomarkers are clinically used in almost all areas of medicine to identify patients likely to respond to a specific treatment, based on their molecular characteristics. Indeed, there is strong evidence that specific molecular mutations in GBM are associated with certain responses to specific treatments. The high-grade expression of the epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR) in GBM was the first such finding and its important role in the pathogenesis of this malignancy has been well documented. Since then, other potential biomarkers have been identified including the v-maf avian musculoaponeurotic fibrosarcoma oncogene homolog, microtubule associated protein-1B, phosphatase and tensin homolog deleted on chromosome ten, vascular endothelial growth factor and phosphatase and tensin homolog. However, the clinical application of these tumour biomarkers in GBM is limited owing to the heterogeneous nature of GBM, their relatively low frequency in GBM samples, the absence of definitive molecular classification and the lack of molecular subtype-specific treatments. This molecular heterogeneity has been challenging to study and the elucidation of an integrated molecular classification is in need of further investigation. Thus, identification of novel biomarkers in GBM may allow the identification of new treatment strategies based on distinct molecular subtypes of GBM. Here we highlight some of the most important potential biomarkers in GBM research with a focus on epidermal growth factor receptor and microtubule associated protein-1B, and discuss their potentials and limitations as biomarkers.

Ben Hoskins/CNET The subprime mortgage mess may be ancient history. Five years ago it seemed like the worst was over. After years of bad news, in February 2010 Moody's affirmed the ratings of $152 billion worth of mortgage securities. That's more than half of the $288 billion in subprime mortgages and other troubled assets that came to be known as "toxic waste," meaning it was considered too risky for use in lending. Even though Wall Street had pushed for a write-down of a total of $1.6 trillion in assets, many
