When clicked, the preview shows every little aspect of the photo in miniature in front of you to check for areas that need to be refined. You are given the option to move the photo by clicking and dragging. You also have the option of saving the temp file and you have the ability to share it on sites like Facebook or Google+ as part of the public share.

Since CS4, there been discussion about removing the file format conversion option from the development which has hindered some photographers from creating batch images. Flexiblity is good, but size is very important for the non-developer photographer.

The code here (appendix A in the ps 5.0 pdf) shows how the UNO would access the Open Image Gallery, select a folder, select filenames, apply the Action and close. We would have to improve the listing to allow customizable but perhaps all we need is for the user to browse the image folder or other folder that would be set in the Action and select the images desired. a UNO's past is always limited, but we're looking forward to that, too!

I don't see the point of a file format conversion. It seems to me that Photoshop should be able to take any RAW photo and preview it, and then if needed, convert the RAW into DNG format and apply all actions. As DNG is a file format I don't know how people actually use their RAW raw files. Would a software provider only be able to compile DNG files & provide RAW to DNG conversion for photographers if it were the only format that can be opened in Photoshop? The risk is that to be successful, this would mean that a software provider would never have to update the raw conversion algorithm as RAW would become obsolete.
